foreword.

The outlook for Canada's financial future is very positive. Overall, the expectation from economic experts is that Canada will continue to experience a strong economic rebound into 2022.

According to the Bank of Canada, the economy will grow approximately 4.6% in 2022. That figure reflects a positive adjustment over previous forecasts. In the spring of 2021, the forecast put 2022 growth at only 3.7%. The Bank also reported an expectation that inflation would cap near the top of the control range before falling back to around 2% as the economy settles after the rebound phase.

Overall, the expectation for 2022 is that financial factors will rise or plateau after strong gains at the end of 2021. For employers, that might lead to:

- enhanced sales numbers and revenues
- growth and the need to scale up their workforce
- increased salaries and compensation packages
- more competitive hiring markets

One way to prepare for these challenges is to build a comprehensive, competitive compensation plan that will be attractive to top talent. Preparing a strong compensation plan in advance will ensure your business is able to swiftly meet your hiring objectives as they arise.

Heading into 2022, business growth is top of mind for most organizations as they dive headfirst into a strong post-pandemic job market. As Canada and the rest of the world recover from the pandemic, the job market has reversed course and we're seeing pre-pandemic labour shortages reemerge in most job sectors. Competition for talent will be fierce and we're already seeing talent shortages crop up in many industries. Developing a strong compensation plan will be critical to hold onto top performers and maximize growth opportunities. Organizations will need a comprehensive compensation strategy that rewards and incentivizes employees, while also being mindful of potential unpredictability in the market. In the following pages of this guide, we explore how labour shortages are impacting hiring and proactive steps you can take to access the talent you need to be successful in 2022.

This salary guide will be your companion to build a strong foundation for your compensation planning in 2022 and beyond. Inside you'll find in-depth salary data for job markets across Canada. Salaries are divided by entry, intermediate and senior experience levels to ensure you have a crystal clear picture of market rates and can offer your employees and new hires competitive salaries that they can't say no to.

Salary information is generated by the Economic Research Institute (ERI) and validated by our industry experts across Canada. ERI compiles robust data on salaries, cost of living, and executive compensation, with current market data for more than 1,000 sectors. All data is provided by employers and comes from a variety of sources such as internally conducted salary surveys and purchased third-party salary surveys. Salary ranges correspond to the 25th and 75th percentiles for entry-level, mid-level, and senior-level (entry: 1-3 years; mid: 4-7 years; senior: 8-12 years). All salaries are expressed in thousands of dollars (e.g., 55.6 = $55,600) and represent annual base salaries (before benefits), with the exception of industrial support which are presented in hourly rates. Roles in finance and accounting correspond to the 25th and 75th percentiles for the 1st, 3rd, 5th, and 10th years of experience. For executive positions, the size of the company has more impact on wages than years of experience, so salaries are based on company revenue. In this guide, data is categorized by region, rather than city reflecting the impact of remote work.

The first step in compensation planning is understanding current trends in the job market. It's critical to stay one step ahead of the market to remain competitive. Businesses, just like everyone else, are emerging from a period of great disruption and uncertainty due to the COVID-19 pandemic. Understanding what the market currently looks like is key to being proactive with your hiring and compensation.

One of the biggest changes of the last year or two has been the normalization of flexible work. Prior to the pandemic, the bulk of employers didn't support remote work efforts for most staff. Reasons such as financial, logistical or work culture were often cited for why remote work was not feasible on a wide scale.

Just 5 years ago, 4% of Canadian workers were working remotely. When the COVID-19 pandemic hit North American in March 2020, that changed dramatically.

32% of Canadian workers now work from their home. Employees in many sectors have been working remotely long enough — and it's been successful enough — that it's been normalized.

Recently, we surveyed Canadian employees to understand how they feel about remote work opportunities. Over 81% of employees working remotely at the time said they were happy with the situation. The top reason given for why working from home was a success was flexibility. Similarly, a PricewaterhouseCoopers survey conducted during the pandemic asked people what their ideal work environment was. More than 60% said it was an environment that allowed at least half of work time to be conducted remotely.

For employers, the conclusion is clear. Flexible work is here to stay. While not everyone can or wants to work 100% remotely, hybrid work situations that allow workers to split their time between in-office and remote work will be a major trend in 2022.

Continuing economic recovery is likely to drive average salaries across all industries upward. Salaries will naturally increase with inflation, but pandemic pushback and growing skills shortages will also help spur those numbers upward.

Ultimately, hiring — particularly in highly competitive sectors and locations — will become increasingly supply-and-demand driven. With multiple businesses seeking to hire staff with similar skill sets, it's only natural that the competition will lead to a bidding war between employers to secure the talents of skilled workers.

Heading into 2022, it's essential that employers of all sizes conduct salary benchmarking analyses. If your pay isn't competitive, you may have trouble hiring new employees in 2022. You might also struggle to retain the talent you already have, making it even more important to create a comprehensive compensation plan for the coming year.

Not surprisingly, the focus on retaining talent will continue to be a focal point for hiring managers in 2022 and beyond. If it's harder to hire new employees, you certainly want to keep the good talent you already managed to hire, after all.

Keeping your existing employees is less expensive than replacing them. Some estimates indicate that companies can lose as much as 1.5 times an employee's annual salary when hiring and training someone to take their place.

At a time when you need to focus your financial resources on offering competitive compensation and investing in growth measures for your business, you certainly want to avoid any unnecessary costs related to turnover. It makes sense that shoring up your retention stats in the upcoming year should be a top priority to further maximize your workforce budget.

And that's a good thing, because employees may be less likely to stay put in 2022, as the world reopens after the pandemic. Workers feel safer getting out of their homes and engaging with new people. They may start looking outside their current job for new opportunities. This is opposite of what happened during the pandemic, when people either hunkered down with a stable job or left the workforce altogether (as was the case for many parents, particularly mothers, who had to take over childcare duties).

High demand for candidates with transferable skills sets, particularly digital skills, is a trend we've been seeing emerge for a few years now. That's certainly going to continue into 2022 and beyond. One of the primary reasons digital skills are so crucial right now stems from lessons learned at the height of the pandemic. The shift to remote work was sudden and most businesses had to take drastic steps to adapt:

- processes weren't always set up to work with remote environments
- employees didn't have the tools they needed to complete work in these environments
- in many cases, employees didn't have the digital skills necessary to complete work, communicate with others and be successful in these environments

Transferable skills have rapidly become a focal point in many jobs, regardless of industry, job title or seniority level. Some of the most sought-after skills employers are looking for are soft skills, as those skills are adaptable and valuable in countless situations. As we head into a new wave of economic opportunity, strong transferable skills will be the key that sets top-performing employees apart.

Businesses rely on leaders to steer the ship through times of trouble (like the pandemic) and drive growth during the good times (the post-pandemic economic boom). Strong leaders do more than just manage employees, they're disciplined, critical thinkers who wield their influence to build a positive and productive work environment.

The shift to remote and hybrid work setups has shone a light on the central role operations play in every business. Employees who have a strong grasp of their employer's processes know how to keep core business operations running smoothly in any circumstances, no matter how challenging.

creativity and innovation

People who think outside the box and are capable of articulating fresh ideas ensure businesses don't get stuck in a rut. New ideas and innovative approaches are a key element of driving sustainable growth and appealing to savvy customers who expect businesses to adapt to their needs.

The IT job market is one of the most competitive markets in Canada for good reason. Coding and programming skills have countless applications for businesses, especially with remote and hybrid work becoming the norm. From enterprise business applications that enable employees to work from anywhere securely, to updating customer-facing ecommerce solutions, the pandemic has irrevocably shifted businesses' reliance on IT.

analysis and research

Knowledge is power and that's never been more true than it is today. Businesses have vast amounts of data at their disposal. They need employees who can parse that data and transform it into actionable insights that can be used to drive business results.

As the world emerges from the depths of the pandemic, all signs are pointing to a booming economy. We're seeing strong job creation in many sectors as companies set their sights on taking advantage of the booming post-pandemic economy and consumers' willingness to spend freely after months of staying home. As the number of job vacancies increase, unemployment rates are rapidly returning to their pre-pandemic lows and the job market has flipped to a candidate-driven market. That's leading to severe skills shortages in many jobs and industries. Skilled candidates have their pick of top employers, while smaller and less competitive businesses are left struggling to fill core roles.

39% of employers say they're already having trouble hiring employees. Skills shortages are impacting every area of business, with companies reporting that it's difficult to fulfill existing orders, scale up, and stay competitive in their market without access to talent. Labour shortages that were once limited to specific industries, such as skilled trades, are now impacting a wide selection of jobs, including roles in accounting, IT and sales. Sectors that are being hit the hardest by skills shortages include manufacturing, food services, construction, retail and healthcare. To respond to this crisis and capture the attention of skilled workers, companies are resorting to measures such as significantly raising wages and rethinking their benefits packages (for instance, offering permanent remote work options is now a must to be competitive in office roles).

You may have heard of the ‘great resignation’, the term referring to the wave of employees who are resigning from their jobs now that the pandemic is subsiding and they feel safe exploring new opportunities outside of their secure, long-term job. With the job market booming, there’s a plethora of opportunities for would-be job seekers to choose from, so it’s an attractive time to seek out new, more lucrative opportunities.

According to research from RBC, the pandemic delayed many workers from retiring. The baby boomer generation is already retiring en masse as they rapidly reach retirement age. The youngest boomers are now in their late fifties and headed for retirement within the next few years, if they haven’t already planned early retirement. Now that the pandemic is subsiding, RBC predicts an increased number of retirements in 2021 and 2022, as would-be retirees feel safe to enjoy their retirement. This trend will further exacerbate labour shortages.

job seekers are being more discerning.

In a strong candidate-driven market, active job seekers have more flexibility to hold out for the right opportunity. There’s a wealth of jobs available in most sectors, so job seekers can narrow their search for opportunities they find most attractive. This leaves employers with below average salaries and lacking benefits in the dust. Currently, one must-have benefit that’s marking potential employers as desirable is the ability to work from home after the pandemic is over. Employers that are requiring full-time, in-office work are quickly shedding employees who have plenty of more flexible employers to choose from. According to our Randstad Employer Brand Research, 63% of employees who are given a choice to work from home say this makes them feel more loyal to their employer.

focus on retention first and foremost

Employers must take proactive steps to hold onto key employees, or risk facing larger recruitment, replacement and training costs down the line. In a competitive market it takes longer and is more expensive to replace employees than to invest in your current workforce and hold onto existing talent. That's not even considering the impact of the loss of knowledge and disruption to business operations. From reevaluating compensation, to rethinking permanent remote work policies, to offering attractive new perks and benefits, employers must think outside of the box to compete with the allure of new, exciting job opportunities.

Your employer brand is your value proposition to potential employees. Having a poor employer brand is tantamount to being invisible in a competitive job market. When potential employees have a variety of job opportunities laid out before them, they will unfailingly choose to work for well-paying and prestigious organizations that look good on their resumes. For small and medium sized businesses without mass name-recognition, it's especially critical to have a well-planned and communicated employer brand that lays out the reasons potential employees should want to work for you.

It's common sense that salaries will increase in a hot job market. When many organizations are fighting to secure the talents of fewer skilled employees, the employers that offer above average compensation will naturally be first-choice options. According to our Randstad Employer Brand Research, salary and compensation continue to be the number 1 driver for job seekers, with 69% of job seekers saying compensation is the most important factor for them when they're searching for a new job. So offering the right salary will be a key factor in your ability to find and attract skilled talent who will stick with your company for the long-haul.

Hiring local Canadian talent continues to be an unspoken preference in many hiring circles. It's a preference that's hurting employers' ability to hire skilled talent, whether they know it or not. A whopping 22% of Canadians identify as foreign-born, and that number is only increasing as the number of people who immigrate to Canada each year continues to outpace Canada's low birth rate. Eliminating foreign-born Canadians from your hiring pool automatically means you're losing out on almost 1 in 4 potential workers. Further, internationally born and trained Canadians are highly skilled, educated and motivated to work. Most new Canadians (60.3%) enter Canada via the Express Entry program which prioritizes entry for immigrants who have desirable skills and job experience. For instance, immigrants hold 50% of STEM degrees in Canada, despite accounting for 22% of the population. Hiring immigrants is a valuable way to access key skills and provide meaningful opportunities to workers that may otherwise be overlooked.

Competitive salaries are critical to success for your business, but your considerations shouldn't stop there. The whole compensation package is important. Additional benefits that go above and beyond a competitive salary will be more important than ever as companies try to hold onto their workers post-pandemic.

As an employer, you can't afford to ignore the wants of the workforce, because you can bet some of your competitors will be meeting them. Understanding the key benefits Canadians are looking for aside from fair and equitable pay can help you prepare job offers and compensation packages more likely to attract top talent and retain them.

flexibility & hybrid work opportunities

A Randstad survey indicated that a third of employees working from home during the pandemic want to work fully remote even after the pandemic is over. And the vast majority of people want some level of remote working options:

The desire for hybrid work opportunities comes down to flexibility and freedom. When asked what the positives of remote work situations were, for example, people cited the ability to have flexible schedules and the lack of commute, which saves them time.

flexible leaders

Employees don't just want flexibility for their schedules. They want to work for leadership who is also flexible and who demonstrates the ability to evolve as situations or employee needs change.

For example, 48% of employees who worked remotely say they want fewer video meetings. Leadership often makes video meetings mandatory or highly encourages participation to help support communication and team building and ensure everyone is on the same page.

But what works for some employees isn't always effective for all, and workers want leaders that understand that truth and are willing to adapt supervisory styles, processes and communication to accommodate a variety of needs.

Around 45% of employees also say they want managers who trust them and listen to them while an equal number say they want more supportive managers. This is true in any environment, whether it's remote, hybrid or in the physical workspace.

The conclusion for employers here is that leadership must be willing to adapt with the trends of 2022 and the future. And they should do so in a way that takes employee preferences into account whenever possible.

internet subsidy and home office set up

In early 2020, many Canadian employers and employees were part of a scramble to move people to remote work wherever possible. A challenge at the heart of that shuffle was that most employers weren't prepared with the type of infrastructure required to support successful production in remote settings.

- People lacked the hardware required for jobs. Not everyone had a work laptop or even access to high-speed internet, and the demand for hardware created shortages that made it difficult for some businesses to stock up.

- Businesses didn't have the right programs. While cloud data has made a huge dent in the market over the past decade, not all businesses had invested in cloud-based project management, customer service, sales or other business software. The result was that people were disconnected from processes or performing extra steps to move work through processes.
- Communication tools were suddenly a high priority. While many traditional teams did already use tools like Slack, suddenly online communication tools and video conferences were the primary modes of communication.

These facts all combined to create remote work environments where people were doing the best they could with what they had — which sometimes meant employees using their personal computing equipment to get work done. At the same time, employers rapidly implemented online communication and work tools, sometimes in an unorganized fashion that left workers confused and frustrated.

Given these common pandemic experiences, it's not surprising that better support for home office set up would be on employee wish lists. Almost 40% said they want proper home equipment — that's the same number of people who said they wanted more manageable workloads, to give you an idea of how much this perk is on employee minds.

When asked what workplaces are doing to better support work-life balance, 13% of employees pointed to financial and other support for setting up a home office.

The bottom line here is that remote work asks employees to use infrastructure in their own homes to generate value for your business. Workers realize this fact, and they don't want to be the only ones responsible for footing the bill for that infrastructure.

focus on social issues and culture

While this is a long-term want for employees of all ages, it's especially important to Gen Z and millennials workers. The overall work experience is important to younger professionals, so it should be important to your business.

Take time to ensure your employer brand includes positive work environments, diversity and inclusion and social impact that might resonate with top talent.

Some of these initiatives are simply about encouraging organic connections within your workforce. A quarter of employees want more casual interactions with coworkers, for example. So before you fill the calendars with mandated Zoom meetups, consider how you can support employees in forging their own connections.

wellness programs

With a global pandemic in everyone's hindsight, it's not at all surprising that employees are concerned about overall wellness. By demonstrating that you care about their health and wellness too, you can build trust and a stronger employer brand.

Around 15% of Canadians listed a formal wellness program as a top benefit they want from employers. Around 14% cited mental health resources and support offered by employers as one of the ways top companies support work-life balance.
